

Ira Sudjono, Psychological Well – Being Of Advocate Viewed From Self-Efficacy And Social Support. (Rostiana D. Nurdjajadi, M.Si., P.si). Magister Science of Psychology Study Program, PIO, Tarumanagara University. (i-xviii, 78 pages, 20 tables, 1 picture, L1-158).

ABSTRACT

The Advocate, who worked with great pressure and had to work fast and accurately, certainly affect the personal circumstances of his/her personal life. An advocate does not only interact with the client but also interacts with his/her fellow lawyers as well gatherings. Advocates feel proud, satisfied clients if it can win a court case, and feel flattered by praise from fellow lawyers or get awards from association of lawyers, and one of the things that strengthen the presence of life in terms of material welfare of advocates

Psychological well-being of the lawyers would need to be examined to understand the situation of advocate as individuals, and social beings, in fulfilling the needs of life, with his full of challenge activities, pressure, competition. Considerable effort to meet the needs, along with a desire to defend, the client won the case, also in conjunction with the desire to get a good social support from fellow lawyers and lawyers associations.

The purpose of this research is to explain the correlation between social support and self-efficacy with psychological well-being of the advocates. This study uses a quantitative approach in which researcher conducted correlation test among variables. Likert scales are used as measurement tools of each variable.

The results showed that both simultaneous and partially, independent variables have a significant positive correlation with the dependent variable. By doing so, this means that if the level of social support and/or self-efficacy is high, then the psychological well-being level will also be high.

With the explanation obtained through this study, researcher suggested the advocates to raise the awareness of their mental health factors within their jobs, particularly on psychological well-being. Since the advocate's workloads seems to be very high, a good performance strategy must be done, namely by selecting the appropriate job and if it's considered too heavy, advocates should be cooperating with other fellow lawyers in doing the job in mention.

Keywords

Psychological well-being, social support, self-efficacy, advocate

