The meaning of life is a condition in which individuals are expected to achieve the purpose of life so that life becomes more meaningful. This study aims to examine the meaning of life relationship with altruistic behavior. Altruistic behavior is the behavior of welfare others without feeling selfish or self-absorbed. Participants in this study are Pinandita Sanggraha in DKI Jakarta amounting to 48 participants. Research methods used Spearman Brown correlation. The results of this study is the meaning of life correlated with altruistic behavior. Based on our research, the meaning of life correlated with altruistic behavior is the view that life is a lot of shortcomings, there is death, have little hope, and has many obstacles. When the participants are increasingly looking at that life is a lot of shortcomings, there is death, have little hope, and considers that this life has many obstacles, then the participants perform more altruistic behaviors, including: (a) help others voluntarily and not expecting anything; (b) happy to be volunteers in various social activities as well as natural disasters; (c) are not bothered when other people ask for help though at lunch time; (d) be happy to help people who made them in difficult situation or made them suffer; (e) does not refuse requests for help from others; (f) do good without being noticed by others; and (g) feel satisfied when they can help others without reward.
